Trapped in a Bahamian Cave

In 2005, a group of six tourists were exploring a cave on the island of Eleuthera when they became trapped. The cave, which is known as Preacher's Cave, is located in the Queen's Highway National Park. The tourists had been exploring the cave for about an hour when a sudden downpour caused the entrance to the cave to collapse. The tourists were trapped in the cave for four days before they were finally rescued.

The tourists were able to survive by rationing their food and water. They also used their clothing to create a makeshift shelter. The tourists were eventually rescued by a team of Bahamian and American rescuers. The rescue effort was complicated by the fact that the cave was flooded and the tourists were located in a remote area.

The story of the tourists who were trapped in Preacher's Cave is a reminder of the dangers of exploring caves. It is important to be prepared before you go exploring a cave. You should always bring a flashlight, a map, and a way to communicate with the outside world.
